IAN HC CHIN J

[SUIT NO: KG 33 OF 1991]

16 JUNE 1998

TORT: Conversion - Evidential items in police custody - Failure to return - Whether there was conversion - Whether police were bailees of the items - Whether liability strict - Vicarious liability - Res ipsa loquitur - Negligence

TORT: Damages - Exemplary damages - Whether must be specifically pleaded - Broome v. Cassell & Co - Whether a correct decision - Conditions for granting exemplary damages - Additional arbitrariness, oppressiveness or unconstitutionality

TORT: Vicarious liability - Liability of government - Acts of police department - Failure to return evidential items in police custody - Master and servant - Authorisation - Whether necessary to establish fault on part of government - Whether liability strict - Res ipsa loquitur

The plaintiff was the sole proprietor of Tien Chan Goldsmiths & Jewellers which was burglarised on or about 18 August 1985 resulting in the loss of gold articles and jewellery. The items were later recovered by the police. Four persons were charged in connection thereto, resulting in one conviction, while the charges against the rest were not proceeded with. The items were earlier tendered as evidence and were ordered by the court to be retained by the police. The items were kept by the first defendant from 2 March 1988 to 19 March 1990.

Although the court had later ordered that the items be returned to the plaintiff, on 28 March 1990 the plaintiff was informed that the items were missing whilst being kept by the first defendant (who at all material times was employed by the second defendant, the Government of Malaysia). The first defendant and his wife were later charged with criminal breach of trust in connection with the missing items. The wife pleaded guilty to an amended charge of dishonest misappropriation while the charge against the first defendant was withdrawn.

a The issues for determination were: (i) whether the first defendant and the police were gratuitous bailees of the items; (ii) whether the items were converted; (iii) whether the second defendant was vicariously liable for the conversion; (iv) whether the first defendant and the police were in breach of duty or negligent; and (v) whether exemplary damages could and ought to be awarded.

c [1] There was prima facie evidence that the first defendant had the authority of the police department and of the second defendant to receive the items on behalf of the police department, and that the police department had constituted itself as the bailee of the items.

[2] Conversion was established when the police department was unable to return the items to the plaintiff after the plaintiff demanded for the same.

d [3] When a servant does an act which he is authorised by his employment to do in certain circumstances or in a manner which is unauthorised and improper, in such cases the employer is liable for the wrongful act.

e [3a] The liability of the bailee was strict and it did not matter who converted the items as long as they were converted while in the custody of the police. Therefore, even if it could be assumed that the conversion was without the fault of the second defendant, it was incumbent upon the second defendant as the disappearance of the items must attract the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

f [4] The disappearance of the items, in the absence of an explanation, must have been due to the negligence of the first defendant and the police department. Since it was not explained how the wife of the first defendant was able to remove the items, the second defendant therefore had failed to discharge the burden of disproving breach of duty or negligence.

g [5] The award of exemplary damages is limited to certain categories of cases, one of which is the case of arbitrary, oppressive or unconstitutional conduct on the part of government servants. However, it is not every act of a police officer without authority that brings that category into play. There must additionally be arbitrariness or oppressiveness or unconstitutionality. Exemplary damages must also be specifically pleaded, which was not done in this case.

[5a] In the present case, the items were misappropriated by the wife of the first defendant and that could not be regarded as arbitrariness or oppressiveness on the part of the first defendant or the police department. The plaintiff therefore had failed to make out a case for exemplary damages. a

JUDGMENT g

Ian HC Chin J:

Introduction

Foong Chee Chong ("the plaintiff") was at all relevant times the sole proprietor of the firm Tien Chan Goldsmiths & Jewellers. He took out the present writ on 1 March 1991 against one Inspector Mohd. Nasir b. Shamsuddin ("the 1st defendant") and the Government of Malaysia ("the 2nd defendant") claiming for damages for conversion and breach of duty or negligence. However, the h

- a* present proceeding concerns only the 2nd defendant as judgment for damages to be assessed had already been obtained against the 1st defendant and the present proceeding is only in respect of the issue of liability. The case was tried on 21 May 1998 with the parties agreeing to the facts which I will set out shortly. The parties have also agreed to be bound by the quantum of
- b* damages (if any) which the Deputy Registrar may award in respect of the case between the plaintiff and the 1st defendant.

Facts Of Case

- c* Foong Chee Chong ("the plaintiff") was the sole proprietor of the firm Tien Chan Goldsmiths & Jewellers which was burglarised on or about 18 August 1985 resulting in his losing gold articles and jewelleries ("the gold") and other gold items ("other items") as well. The gold and other items were recovered by the police. Four persons were charged in connection thereto, one was convicted and sentenced to a term of imprisonment while the charge against
- d* the rest was not proceeded with. For the purpose of the case resulting in the said conviction of the person, the gold and other items were tendered as evidence and were on 16 November 1985 ordered by the court to be "retained by the police pending the outcome of the trial of the other three accused" which case was, as mentioned earlier, not proceeded with. The gold and other
- e* items were "released into the possession of the police" and were kept by the 1st defendant during the period from 2 March 1988 to 19 March 1990. On 17 November 1989, the court ordered that the gold and other items be returned to the complainant. This was followed by the plaintiff writing on 22 December 1989 to the Officer-in-Charge, Major Crime Division, Central Police Station, Kuching, to seek the return of the gold and other items as the prosecution
- f* was no longer proceeding with the case against the other three accused. The plaintiff was told around March 1990 that they could be returned to him. However, on 28 March 1990 the plaintiff was notified by Central Police Officers at the Divisional Police Headquarters that the gold was missing whilst kept by the 1st defendant though the other items remained.
- g* At all material times, the 1st defendant was employed by the 2nd defendant as a Police Inspector and paid in respect of his duties as an officer of the 2nd defendant wholly out of revenues of the Government. The 1st defendant was, as mentioned earlier, the prosecuting officer in the case which resulted
- h* in the said conviction of the person. The 1st defendant and his wife were later charged with having between 2 March 1988 and 19 March 1990 committed criminal breach of trust in connection with the gold that was missing. The charge against the wife was later amended to one of dishonest misappropriation to which the wife pleaded guilty and was convicted and sentenced while the charge against the 1st defendant was withdrawn. The other items were
- i* subsequently returned to the plaintiff.

Issues

From the pleadings and speeches of learned counsel for the parties, it would appear that the issues for determination are (1) whether the 1st defendant and police department were gratuitous bailees of the gold, (2) whether the gold was converted, (3) whether the 2nd defendant is vicariously liable for the conversion and (4) whether the 1st defendant and the police department were in breach of duty or negligent. There is a further issue of whether exemplary damages could and ought to be awarded.

(1) Were The 1st Defendant And The Police Department Gratuitous Bailees?

The agreed facts relied on by Mr. H.C. Sim, learned counsel for the plaintiff, as establishing a bailment are (1) the recovery by the police of the gold following the arrest of three suspects, (2) the handing over of the gold to the 1st defendant pursuant to an order of the court made on 16 November 1985 for the gold to be “retained by the police pending the outcome of the trial” of the said criminal case against the said burglars and (3) the subsequent possession “by the police” of the gold pursuant to the order. As against that, Mr. Ahmad Razif bin Sidek, the learned Federal Counsel representing the 2nd defendant, submitted that it was not established that the 1st defendant was authorised by the 2nd defendant to keep the gold. The arguments call for a consideration of what legally is a “bailment”. Mr. Sim had referred to Halsbury’s Laws, 4th edn, vol. 2, para. 1801 where it is stated:

... Under modern law, a bailment arises whenever one person (the bailee) is voluntarily in possession of goods belonging to another person (the bailor)<sup>2</sup>. The legal relationship of bailor and bailee can exist independently of any contract, and is created by the voluntary taking into custody of goods which are the property of another, as in cases of sub-bailment or of bailment by finding<sup>3</sup>. The element common to all types of bailment is the imposition of an obligation, because the taking of possession in the circumstances involves an assumption of responsibility for the safe keeping of the goods<sup>4</sup>. An action against a bailee can be regarded as an action on its own, sui generis, arising out of the possession had by the bailee of the goods<sup>5</sup>.

The recovery of the gold by the police following the arrest of the four persons, in my view constituted the police the bailee of the gold which continued when the Magistrates’ Court ordered that the gold be retained by the police. But the gold was handed to the 1st defendant and this calls for a consideration of whether the fact that the gold was handed to the 1st defendant prevents the police department from continuing to be a bailee. Mr. Razif appears to me to argue that the plaintiff must establish that the 1st defendant was authorised by the police department or the 2nd defendant to receive the gold which the Magistrates’ Court ordered to be retained by the police before the police

- a* department can be said to be the bailee. In my view, it is untenable on the part of the 2nd defendant to contend that the 1st defendant has no authority whatsoever from the 2nd defendant to receive the gold from the Magistrates' Court. In the first place when the 1st defendant appeared in the Magistrates' Court as the prosecution officer, he had been clothed with all the necessary powers by the police department and by the 2nd defendant in relation to the conduct of the case and the custody of the exhibits, including their production in court and the subsequent resumption of the custody. Having paraded the 1st defendant as having such authority, there is prima facie evidence that the 1st defendant had the authority of the police department and the 2nd defendant to receive the gold on behalf of the police department. Furthermore, Mr. Razif had conceded that the gold was with the police department. Therefore, I am of the view that in so far as the police department is concerned, they had also constituted themselves the bailee of the gold. This takes me to the second issue of whether there was conversion of the gold.

d (2) Was There Conversion Of The Gold?

Conversion was established when the police department was unable to return the gold to the plaintiff after the plaintiff demanded for the same (The Taveechai Marine [1995] 1 MLJ 413).

e (3) Is The 2nd Defendant Vicariously Liable For The Conversion?

- f* For the purpose of this issue, it will be recalled that the gold came into the possession of the 1st defendant. It is also to be borne in mind that the 1st defendant was constituted bailee of the gold. Therefore, when a demand was made for the return of the gold conversion was committed by the 1st defendant when he failed to deliver the same to the plaintiff. Mr. Razif had contended that the act of conversion by the 1st defendant was not done "in the course of employment" and the 2nd defendant is therefore not vicariously liable.

- g* First of the cases relied on by Mr. Razif in support of his contention is Goh Choon Seng v. Lim Kim Soo [1925] All ER Rep. 170 PC. That case concerns the lands of an appellant and that of a respondent which were separated by a wasteland. Part of the duty of the appellant's servants was to collect vegetable rubbish and burn it on the appellant's land but on one occasion the servants, without the appellant's authority, burned it on the wasteland with the result that a fire spread and damaged the respondent's property. A passage of that case, p. 172, relied on is in these terms:
- h*

The principle is well laid down in some of the cases cited by the Chief Justice, which decide that

When a servant does an act which he is authorised by his employment to do in certain circumstances or in a manner which are unauthorised and improper, in such cases the employer is liable for the wrongful act.

As the learned Chief Justice says, the manager of the plantation was authorised by his employment to burn the weeds, and that he did it in a manner and at a place which was not authorised by his employer, makes no difference. Time and place are only circumstances or incidents. It is not even suggested that it would have made any difference to the mischief done if the fires had been kindled on the appellant's side of the hedge. As regards all the cases which were brought to their Lordships' notice in the course of the argument this observation may be made. They fall under one of three heads: (i) The servant was using his master's time or his master's place or his master's horses, vehicles, machinery or tools for his own purposes: then the master is not responsible. Cases which fall under this head are easy to discover upon analysis. There is more difficulty in separating cases under heads (ii) and (iii). Under (ii) are to be ranged the cases where the servant is employed only to do a particular work or a particular class of work, and he does something out of the scope of his employment. Again, the master is not responsible for any mischief which he may do to a third party. Under head (iii) some cases like the present, where the servant is doing some work which he is appointed to do, but does it in a way which his master has not authorised and would not have authorised, had he known of it. In these cases the master is, nevertheless, responsible.

Mr. Razif contended that there is no document to show that the 1st defendant was authorised to keep the gold though he was authorised to prosecute in a criminal case. Therefore, according to learned counsel, the act of keeping the gold was an unauthorised act and is not a wrongful or unauthorised mode of doing some act which is authorised by the 2nd defendant. The short answer to that contention is how was the 1st defendant able to produce the gold in court if he was not authorised to have custody of it. Furthermore, as I mentioned earlier, by allowing a police officer, such as the 1st defendant, to appear in court as a prosecuting officer, the police department and consequently the Government of Malaysia, had implicitly authorised that person to handle the exhibits, which include the taking into custody the exhibits. It must not be forgotten that the only person a subordinate court can liaise with at any time of a court case is the prosecuting officer and that officer is the only person whom the court will be able to hand any exhibits to in connection with any case. Therefore, it is a necessary implication that the officer has been authorised on behalf of the Government of Malaysia to take into custody of the exhibits when the court makes an order that the same be kept by the police or by the prosecution officer. If such is not the case, then at every turn in the course of the case, the court will have to require from the prosecution officer a written authority from the Government of Malaysia to say that he has been authorised to take into custody the exhibits which a court may order

- a* the police or prosecution to take into possession. It is not difficult to imagine the havoc and delay it would cause when such written authorisation is required as adjournment would be necessary to procure such and in the meantime there is the dilemma of keeping the exhibits, say a tractor or a diamond necklace, safe while waiting for written authorisation.
- b* Learned counsel further contended that the act of keeping the gold could not be regarded as a reasonable or necessary thing to do by a prosecuting officer but he did not elaborate any further. For this latter proposition, learned counsel had dutifully referred to Zakaria bin Che Soh v. Chooi Kum Loong & Anor [1986] 1 MLJ 324. That case concerns a driver in the employ of the
- c* government who met with an accident while driving a vehicle with the permission of the head of department. There the court held that even if the driver was on his way home for lunch when he met with the accident the government was still to be vicariously liable on the ground that though the act was not strictly one required by his employment to perform but it was
- d* still to be regarded as within the sphere of his employment as it was a reasonable or necessary thing to do under all the circumstances unless it was expressly or impliedly excluded from his employment. The court further held that the test to be applied is whether the manner of doing the act was not so far remote from anything contemplated by either party as to take the act out
- e* of the employment. This case illustrates how the court would drag into the orbit of the sphere of employment where the circumstances of the case justify. In the present case, the act of the 1st defendant taking into custody is a necessary and reasonable act of the sphere of employment as otherwise, the court would have no one to turn to deliver the gold to after it had made the
- f* order that the gold be retained by the police. In fact, the act of the 1st defendant taking into custody the gold was so connected with his duties as a prosecution officer that it must be regarded as a mode of doing them (Roshairree bin Abdul Wahab v. Mejar Mustafa bin Omar & Ors. [1996] 3 MLJ 337).
- g* The facts reveal that though the 1st defendant was initially charged with criminal breach of trust of the gold the charge was not proceeded with after his wife pleaded guilty to a charge of dishonest misappropriation of the gold. This means that the gold while in the custody of the police was converted by someone other than the 1st defendant. This fact had not been urged by Mr.
- h* Razif in relation to the question of liability for conversion. Even if issue was taken based on that fact, I am of the view that it would have been met by the answer of Mr. Sim that the liability of the bailee is strict and it does not matter who converted the gold as long as the gold was converted while in the custody of the police, citing Port Swettenham Authority v. T.W. Wu & Co. (M) Sdn Bhd [1978] 2 MLJ 137 and "The Taveechai Marine" [1995] 1

MLJ 413 and in any event, even assuming that it can be a defence that the conversion was without the fault of the 2nd defendant or its servants, it was incumbent upon the 2nd defendant since the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies (Chua Chye Leong Alan v. Grand Palace Defendants-Luxe Nite Club Pte Ltd [1993] SLR 449, 450) to establish that there was no fault on their part. There was a total lack of evidence on the part of the 2nd defendant. As for the case of Lee Kim Mah & 22 Ors v. Abdul Rahman b. Sharif & Anor [1996] 1 CLJ 204, I place no reliance on it as the 1st defendant servant, unlike in that case, was not convicted of criminal breach of trust. Furthermore, it is not clear what the cause of action in that case is though it appears to be for a certain sum of money but the cause or causes of action had not been stated.

(4) Were 1st Defendant And The Police Department In Breach Of Duty Or Negligent?

Given the fact that the gold was handed to the 1st defendant to be kept by the police department, the disappearance of the gold must surely attract the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur which I have said earlier. The disappearance of the gold, in the absence of an explanation, must have been due to the negligence of the 1st defendant and the police department. Since it was not explained how the wife of the 1st defendant was able to remove the gold, the 2nd defendant had failed to discharge the burden of disproving breach of duty or negligence.

(5) Whether Exemplary Damages Could And Ought To Be Awarded?

Mr. Sim had in his submission urged the court to award exemplary damages even though the same was not pleaded, relying on Broome v. Cassell & Co. [1971] 2 QB 354 CA, 378, 399, where it was held permissible. The court there, at p. 399, remarked that it was a quite ridiculous suggestion in the Supreme Court Practice (1970) Vol. 1, p. 263, that a claim for exemplary damages must be pleaded since that may require an amendment to the pleading with each offensive step in the conduct of the libel case defence since the defendant's conduct is a factor to be considered. Though the English rules had since been amended, by the provision of O. 18 r. 8(3) – “A claim for exemplary damages or for provisional damages must be specifically pleaded together with the facts on which the party pleading relies”, to provide for the pleading of such a claim our rules had not been so amended and therefore, according to learned counsel, the court can still award exemplary damages. The amendment did not resolve the reservation expressed in that case about the need for amendment of the pleading. For me it stands to reason that the facts upon which exemplary damages ought to be awarded should be made known at the early stage to the opposing party so that sufficient time is given to prepare an answer. This can only be achieved by pleading the same.

- a* Whether exemplary damages are claimed or not may determine the course of an action, like whether to call evidence and what evidence. In the present case, the facts were agreed to with no oral testimony and with no inkling that exemplary damages would be claimed. To allow a claim for exemplary damages at this late stage is surely conduct amounting to an ambush which
- b* does not serve the cause of justice. For me, I am of the view that it ought to be pleaded and the failure to plead should deprive a party from claiming exemplary damages. The decision of Broome v. Cassell & Co did not turn on the interpretation of the Rules of the High Court but rather on the issue of exemplary damages that may be awarded in libel cases which had been
- c* awarded in many cases without the need for pleading the same. Since O. 18 r. 7(1) of the Rules of the High Court 1980 requires material facts to be pleaded and since a claim for exemplary damages are dependent upon certain facts, surely they must, as required by O. 18 r. 7(1), be pleaded. Apart from that, it appears from the case of Hock Hua Bank Berhad v. Leong Yew Chin T/A West Malaysia Frozen Food Co. [1987] 1 CLJ 126 FC that exemplary
- d* damages had to be pleaded though that was not an issue but the court there considered the question of an amendment to include a prayer for exemplary damages in relation to the question of whether an amendment should be allowed when the claim was statute-barred. Nevertheless, that case serves to illustrate that exemplary damages were in practice pleaded. In any event, I
- e* am humbly of the view that the English court in Broome v. Cassell & Co took a wrong turn when it decided that exemplary damages need not be pleaded since that decision brought about the said amendment to the English rules which negated the ruling notwithstanding the reservation expressed in Broome v. Cassell & Co regarding the need for constant amendment in libel
- f* cases when the conduct of a defendant became more offensive during the course of the trial.

- I will, nevertheless, in case I am wrong in not following Broome v. Cassell & Co, consider whether this is a fit case for the award of exemplary damages. In urging exemplary damages, learned counsel contended that the fact that the
- g* 1st defendant was a prosecuting officer and had arbitrarily and oppressively infringed the plaintiff's right, justifies such award, relying no doubt on one of the categories of cases – the arbitrary, oppressive or unconstitutional action of the servant of government – where exemplary damages are awarded, mentioned in a passage of Lord Devlin in Rookes v. Barnard [1964] AC 1129
- h* at 1226-1227 that was approved in Broome v. Cassell & Co. Ltd. [1972] AC 1027. The facts showed that the gold had somehow ended in the hands of the wife of the 1st defendant with, it can be assumed, the help of the 1st defendant. Those are the damning acts but Mr. Sim had not elaborated how those acts or any other acts in this case can be said to be “arbitrary or
- i* oppressive” as envisaged by Rookes v. Barnard, leaving “unconstitutionality” alone since it is not alleged. In order to determine what those terms connote, it is necessary to look at the origin of exemplary damages. For this purpose I can do no better than to quote from McGregor on Damages, 15 edn., para. 407 where it is said:

In the 1760s exemplary damages first made their appearance on the English legal scene. The earliest cases arose in the cause celebre of John Wilkes and the North Briton. In the government's effort to stop the North Briton from being published, a variety of individuals suffered interference at the hands of public officials, and in two tort actions of 1763 based upon such interference, Huckle v. Money [1763] 2 Wils. KB 205 and Wilkes v. Wood [1763] Lofft 1, awards of exemplary damages were made. By the end of the decade further awards had appeared in other contexts, and thereafter exemplary damages became a familiar feature of tort – though never contract – law, being awarded not only in cases of assault, false imprisonment, defamation, seduction and malicious prosecution but also in cases of trespass to land and, eventually, trespass to goods.

It would appear to me from that passage that a claim based on conversion would come within those cases called trespass to goods and since exemplary damages were awarded for such cases, there is no reason why a claim for conversion should not be entitled for exemplary damages. That appears to me to be the position until 1960 when the situation changed and this is how the said author put it, at para. 407:

In the 1960s the situation totally changed. In Rookes v. Barnard [1964] AC 1129 the House of Lords took the opportunity to review the whole doctrine and held that, except in a few exceptional cases which are dealt with later, it is no longer permissible to award exemplary damages against a defendant, however outrageous his conduct. That their lordships recognised the exemplary principle as out of place in the law of damages is clear from the fact that they stated that their task was to consider, in the absence of any decision of the House approving an award of exemplary damages, whether it was open to them "to remove an anomaly from the law of England." There was, however, an attempt by the Court of Appeal in Broome v. Cassell & Co. [1971] 2 QB 354 (CA) to question the decision, but on the appeal in that case their lordships put paid to any such questionings. The House was, in the words of the Lord Chancellor, "not prepared to follow the Court of Appeal in its criticisms of Rookes v. Barnard, which ... imposed valuable limits on the doctrine of exemplary damages as they had hitherto been understood in English law and clarified important questions which had previously been undiscussed or left confused." "We cannot, he added, "depart from Rookes v. Barnard here. It was decided neither per incuriam nor ultra vires this House."

a From the time of the decision in Rookes v. Barnard, the award of exemplary damages was limited to certain categories of cases one of which, as mentioned earlier, was the case of arbitrary, oppressive or unconstitutional conduct of the servants of government. This limitation is elaborated in the following passage of the said author, at para. 415:

b It may be a matter for speculation how far the House, in selecting this category, was really impressed by the difference in the context of damages between the public and private sectors and how far it was motivated by the need to retain some scope for exemplary damages in order not to appear to be acting too cavalierly with the doctrine of precedent; in such a search, what better

c authorities to leave standing than those in which exemplary damages had originated? In Broome [1972] AC 1027, 1129H-1130A Lord Diplock doubted whether today it was still necessary to retain this category but in any event it seems unlikely that in practice there will be many cases which will fall within it. The tort books and the court lists are hardly full of cases of actions arising out of oppressive conduct of public servants. It is probably true to say that

d the first three cases of the opening salvo in the campaign for exemplary damages are the only decisions of the past two centuries which survive, after Rookes, by virtue of falling within this category, while Holden v. Chief Constable of Lancashire [1987] QB 380 (CA) is a so far isolated latterday illustration. In that case it was accepted that a wrongful arrest by a police officer fell within the category and that, accordingly, whether or not to award

e exemplary damages should have been left to the jury; the court was not prepared to accept that every act of a police officer without authority brought the category into play though it was of the view that, if an act did so because of unconstitutionality, there was no need also to show arbitrary and oppressive behaviour since there were in this first common law category in effect three

f sub-categories.

I am inclined to adopt the principle, mentioned in the paragraph just quoted, that not every act of a police officer without authority brought that category into play. There must additionally be arbitrariness or oppressiveness or unconstitutionality (like wrongful arrest in Holden v. Chief Constable of Lancashire, supra). In the present case the gold was misappropriated by the wife of the 1st defendant and I do not see how that can be regarded as arbitrariness or oppressiveness on the part of the 1st defendant or the police department. I am therefore of the view that the plaintiff had failed to make out a case for exemplary damages.

h Conclusion

In the premises I order that judgment be entered by the plaintiff against the 2nd defendant for damages that will be assessed by the Deputy Registrar. Costs to the plaintiff.
